This project was initiated because it was discovered that used plastic papers are toxic when burnt; causes poor harvest because they don't decay easily and disturb plant roots from penetrating in the soil. Due to this environmental hazard it was then discovered that used plastic papers can be recycled into school bags, caps, key holders, tablemats, back raises, purses of different shapes, slippers and house decorations. With the knowledge acquired by our coordinator, she is capable and has been organizing seminars to various women's groups in our community and Ndop region.

We envisage increasing poultry production in our region from current 4,000 a month to 40,000 a month capacity by 2013. We also envisage having Training section to train farmers on poultry management. Thus, the premise of the project is to increase food self-sufficiency and alleviate poverty amongst the rural population of Cameroon's Bui Division who number over 480,000. The empowerment of these people through poultry farming – whom we consider to be under-privileged – is an effective tool for rural development.
